Indonesian Muslims and their Place in the Larger World of Islam

Paper presented at the 2011 Indonesia Update

Martin van Bruinessen, Utrecht University

Let me begin with an anecdote. It must have been 1987 or 1988 that, while visiting the large pesantren of Bantet near Cirebon, I was having a chat with the senior kiai there, Kiai Abdullah Abbas. Kiai Abdullah was a wonderful man to speak with, he had vivid memories of the closing years of Dutch colonial rule, the Japanese occupation, the Revolution, and of course stormy years of early Independence, the violent inauguration of the New Order, and the years of Development. He was nostalgic for the Sukarno years: "we are more prosperous now," he said, "but in those days we were proud of being Indonesian. When we went to Arabia on the hajj and we told people where we were from, they always reacted with admiration and said 'Ah! Indonesia! Ahmad Sukarno!' and we felt that we counted for something. We don't get that sort of responses anymore when we travel abroad, something important has gone lost..."

Kiai Abdullah admittedly was a Sukarnist and Indonesian nationalist, and one of those who felt that Indonesia, as a large Muslim nation recently liberated from the colonial past, should rightly play a leading role in a third bloc: between the capitalist (and largely Christian) bloc and the communist (and presumably Atheist) bloc. The Bandung Conference (1955) and the following conferences confirmed Sukarno's – and by implication Indonesia's – leading role in the ensuing Non-Aligned Movement. By performing the pilgrimage to Mecca (in 1955) and adopting the name of Ahmad, i.e. H. Ahmad Sukarno emphasized his identity as a Muslim leader and a leader of Muslims. Kiai Abdullah Abbas' nostalgic memories suggest that many Muslims of other nations recognized this leading role and shared the hopes of a shift in the global balance of power.

A half century ago, the idea of the secular Muslim nation of Indonesia leading what came to be known as the Third World was not only thinkable but briefly appeared to become reality. As we know, the dream was not to last; the Non-Aligned Movement fell apart, Sukarno was
